In this setting lies the great apple orchard of nearly six hundred acres. Through my long window, as I write, I can see beyond the Pecos, on the east, Comanche Draw, down which the bucks poured on their way to the westward mountains; and through the window at my shoulder comes the cooing of countless turtle doves, the varied gayety of the mockingbird and the spicy fragrance of the wind blowing from the orchard over tall, wild sweet clover. Three-quarters of a mile away to the west the orchard house and packing sheds lie concealed among the ten-year-old trees. It is worth while to take the stroll just at sunrise, when the unpaintable colors are lying on the Pecos Bluffs, and to...
