The pain felt by a noble mind, whether it arise from bereavement, and thus like The lightning s flash Reveals what it destroys, or from the petty cares which beset our weary existence in its eternal revolution about the vanity of this world, is never depressing; it is always a brave and elevating sentiment--a kind of suffering pride which alone overcomes the force of adversity. Nature has also expressed her will in the distinction of the sexes, ordaining that tender emotions should afford comfort to the gentler sex, while man finds his support in vigorous efforts of the mind. On this active and passive state of feeling depend the different internal relations of man and woman, whilst the world of thought is the same for both. These few hints may suffice. I have been brief, for my limits will not admit of full discussion....
